

The first place is where I am. It is where this will depart from. As if it is being dropped into a current it will arrive somewhere (whether predetermined or not). The next place is the place of arrival. It is where you are, where this has appeared. What can be most apparent with these two places is the distance between both. But there is more than this distance to consider. There is also the movement through this distance. The velocity of a travel. This movement has transformed this place into a place of arrival. It has acted upon here with a force. Though, all of this is unnoticeable to the eye. And then there is where this is going. This can be anywhere or nowhere, continuing or discontinuing its path.
